> Twenty-two years have passed, we find, Since a youth and maiden fair Decided earth held no greater gift Than with each other life to share. So hand in hand they started out Upon this new journey of life As a brave, true-hearted husband And a faithful, loving wife.

The vows that then were plighted They had no wish to forget, As, ever loyal to each other, Their choice could not regret; With the future still before them, Fancy painting visions bright, Side by side their way pursuing, Ever on the side of right.

When the road was smooth and easy, Filled with sunshine all the way, Then our friends rejoiced together— Enjoyed the beauties of the day; But when clouds arose and burdens Prove to be their lot to bear, These they bore together bravely, Both unflinchingly their share.

And thus united, journeying on, One by one the years have flown, Dancing at Hale's pavilion Thursday

A certain M. P., as proud and fond as a man should be of his beautiful young wife, was just about rising to speak in a debate when a telegram was put into his hands. He read it, left the house, jumped into a cab, drove to Charing Cross and took the train to Dover. Next day he returned home, rushed into his wife's bedroom and, finding her there, upbraided the astonished lady in no measured terms. She protested her ignorance of having done

Wit on the Field of Honor.

When Curran, the famous Irish barrister who rose to such eminence, met Egan on the field of honor to decide a quarrel with pistols the latter took exception to the inequality of their personal appearance. "I might as well fire at a razor's edge," he said, referring to his adversary's slightness of physique, while he himself offered "as good a mark as a turf stack."

Without a moment's hesitation Curran declared that he had no desire to take an undue advantage of his opponent, and he was willing to let his side view be chalked out on Mr. Egan's body and any shot that hit outside the mark should not count.
